Bread and Circuses: The Political Consequences of Entertainment in Autocracies

Abstract

Authoritarian states are increasingly investing in wellbeing, entertainment, and leisure for their citizens and residents. Saudi Arabia's Vision 2030 has expanded access to entertainment and leisure options in the country, undertaken not only for the purposes of economic diversification, but also explicitly to improve quality of life. I hypothesize that state provision of entertainment and wellbeing constitutes a strategy of political control by reducing political criticism of the regime. Using 22 million tweets geotagged in Saudi Arabia between 2017-2019, the height of the initial rollout of entertainment in the country, and fine-tuned Saudi language models classifying sentiment and political criticism, I test three possible mechanisms through which entertainment might impact political behavior: positive affect, attention substitution, and government evaluation. I first establish a strong relationship between positive affect and political criticism – people who are happier are less likely to criticize the government online. Yet exploiting variation in the timing and location of state-sponsored entertainment events, I find little evidence that entertainment reduces criticism by making citizens happier or diverting their attention from politics on average. Instead, I find that political response to state-provided entertainment depends on citizens' prior attitudes towards entertainment. Both supporters and opponents of entertainment express substantially less political criticism on days with more entertainment provision. While supporters experience no corresponding improvement in affect, consistent with an evaluative response to government provision, opponents of entertainment become happier on high-entertainment days. This divergence suggests that entertainment shapes political expression not only by improving citizens' mood or diverting attention, but by changing overall evaluation of the government.

1 Introduction

The phrase "bread and circuses," coined by the poet Juvenal in ancient Rome almost 2,000 years ago, has retained remarkable longevity in its ability to describe the placation of the masses. Written under the growing authoritarianism of the Roman empire, the statement criticizes the willingness of citizens to trade political representation for panem et circenses – bread for sustenance, and chariot races for entertainment. While existing research in political science has found a great deal of evidence suggesting authoritarian regimes use "bread" – that is to say, material dependence through private goods such as jobs, subsidies, and indeed, bread – to maintain control over populations, far less has been said about the authoritarian use of "circuses."

Yet, over the past decade, many authoritarian states have become conspicuous providers of entertainment and leisure. China's 2021 five-year plan called for the construction of urban green spaces and large parks to encourage physical activity (Bradsher 2021). Saudi Arabia welcomed cinemas and concerts to the country in 2017 as part of plans for economic diversification, explicitly linking them to wellbeing: "At the heart of our Vision is a society in which all enjoy a good quality of life, a healthy lifestyle and an attractive living environment" (Vision 2030: Saudi Arabia 2017, 22–23). Russia opened its first Disneyland-equivalent theme park with Putin's blessing in 2020 (Kozlov 2016), and in the United Arab Emirates, Abu Dhabi has been granted status as an official "Bike City" by the governing body of sports cycling, thanks to government investment in hundreds of miles bike track and trails (Neild 2022).

These goods go beyond what is often associated with authoritarian cooptation and the provision of traditional public services (Rosenfeld 2020; Svolik 2012; Magaloni 2006). Unlike authoritarian redistribution via private goods – such as subsidies, jobs, and political positions – entertainment and leisure are public and club goods that are shared and collectively experienced by many. Entertainment and leisure are also not survival goods – they do not enmesh a citizen's livelihood to the success of the regime (Albertus, Fenner, and Slater 2018). While a pleasure to have, festivals, bike paths, theme parks, and green spaces are all goods citizens can live without. Entertainment and leisure are also tangible, providing more than what might be attributed to "informational autocrats" – leaders who "survive by leading citizens to believe – rationally but incorrectly – that they are competent and public-spirited" (Guriev and Treisman 2019, 101). The examples in the previous paragraph were delivered upon and in some cases explicitly provided to increase the wellbeing and quality of life of citizens and residents.

While regimes may invest in entertainment and leisure for reasons beyond quality of life of their citizenry, we know surprisingly little about whether these "circuses" have actual political consequences. Unlike conventional distributive benefits, these policies are valuable to citizens primarily because they make everyday life more enjoyable. Can these experiential benefits also generate political acquiescence?

I examine this question in Saudi Arabia, where in 2017, the government abruptly ended longstanding restrictions on public entertainment and invested heavily in cinemas, concerts, festivals, and other forms of entertainment. This transformation provides an unusual opportunity to examine how the expansion of state-sponsored entertainment impacted citizens' political expression.

Analyzing over 22 million tweets geotagged in Saudi Arabia between November 2017 and June 2019, the height of the novel provision of entertainment, and fine-tuned Saudi Arabic language models to measure political criticism and sentiment, I find that entertainment events have distinct affective and political consequences across different groups of Saudis. Saudis who previously expressed opposition toward entertainment exhibit greater positive affect on days with more entertainment events, and are less likely to express political criticism online. Saudis who previously expressed enthusiasm about entertainment in the country also become less politically critical, however they experience no corresponding improvement in affect. These responses suggest that entertainment can indeed reduce political criticism, but through different mechanisms for different types of people, and that the effects are most pronounced among those previously engaged with the policy.

This paper proceeds as follows. I first situate the rise of entertainment leisure policies within existing research on authoritarian control and political behavior. I then theorize three pathways through which entertainment and leisure might impact political expression: positive affect (H1), attention substitution (H2), and government evaluation (H3), and discuss the selection of Saudi as a case study. I next describe the Twitter and entertainment-event data and the language models used to measure political criticism, sentiment, and engagement with entertainment policy. I then test the three predictions using a panel of author-day observations and a two-way fixed-effects design that exploits variation in the intensity of entertainment provision across Saudi cities and over time. The treatment is a city-day indicator for high entertainment provision – days when a city has three or more government-sponsored entertainment events. Author fixed effects absorb time-invariant differences across users, while date fixed effects absorb national shocks common to all cities on a given day. Identification thus comes from comparing changes in outcomes for the same Twitter users as provision of local entertainment intensity changes, accounting for national trends on a given day. Because I observe the availability of entertainment rather than individual attendance at events, these estimates capture the intent-to-treat effect of local exposure to entertainment provision.

I first establish a baseline relationship between mood and political criticism in Section 5 – that is, happier people are less politically critical – which is the empirical premise underlying H1, the affective pathway. I then test whether greater entertainment provision improves mood and reduces political criticism, as H1 predicts.

I next use the same entertainment-event variation to test H2, the attention-substitution pathway. I examine whether high-event days increase entertainment-related discussion while reducing non-entertainment political criticism. This allows me to distinguish an increase in attention to entertainment from actual substitution away from political expression.

Finally, I test H3, the evaluative pathway, by examining whether the effects of entertainment depend on users' prior attitudes toward the policy. I classify users as entertainment "lovers," who expressed support for entertainment policy; entertainment "haters," who expressed opposition; and "unclear" users, who discussed entertainment without expressing a clearly valenced preference (Section 7.1). I then estimate whether the effects of high-event days on mood and political criticism differ across these groups in Section 7.2.

My results suggest that on average, entertainment events do not improve mood or reduce political criticism. While they substantially increase entertainment-related discussion, this attention does not replace non-entertainment political criticism, providing little support for an attention substitution account (H2). Rather, political responses to entertainment are concentrated among users with revealed prior attitudes toward entertainment: both supporters and opponents become less likely to criticize. These heterogeneous effects are consistent with an evaluative pathway among supporters, while the affective response among opponents indicates that evaluation alone does not explain the reduction in criticism. I discuss these implications in Section 9.

These findings support the idea that modern authoritarian states no longer solely rely on the classic toolkit of repression, material dependence, and the manipulation of information for political control. Governments can also shape political behavior through public and club goods provided to improve everyday quality of life. By showing that nonessential, experiential goods, like leisure and entertainment, can alter political expression, this paper identifies an understudied form of authoritarian governance and expands the range of policies we should consider when explaining how autocrats generate political acquiescence.

2 Theoretical Framework

Modern authoritarian governments increasingly spend not only on the material welfare of their citizens, but on their leisure, entertainment, and everyday enjoyment. The emirate of Dubai's 2040 Urban Master Plan aims to increase available recreation and green spaces by 105 percent, including a 2 billion AED (545 million USD) wellbeing resort and 355 million AED (97 million USD) in development of public beaches (Dubai 2040 | Urban Master Plan & Sustainable Development,). In 2016, King Salman of Saudi Arabia announced by decree the creation of the General Entertainment Authority (al-Hayaa al-Amma lil-Tarfih), a state body whose sole mandate is to develop and regulate entertainment in the country; the head of the GEA announced a 10 year investment of 240 billion SAR (64 billion USD) two years later (DPA 2018). While some funding for these projects comes from the private sector, a significant amount of financing comes from government budgets and state sovereign wealth funds. Why would an authoritarian government spend billions on making everyday life more enjoyable?

Explanations for these investments, particularly in the Arabian Gulf, often speak to efforts to diversify economies – moving away from dependence on rents from hydrocarbons and building a thriving private sector with productive local workforces employed outside government (Kinninmont 2017; C. W. Jones 2017) – and soft power abroad (Roxborough 2026; Hvistendahl 2021). Yet, as autocratic leadership in these countries point out, providing entertainment, leisure, and general wellbeing for citizens and residents is instrumental in its own right.

Saudi's Crown Prince, Mohamed bin Salman, noted in an interview with the state-run Al Arabiya ("Full Transcript of Prince Mohammed bin Salman's Al Arabiya interview" 2016) the importance of entertainment and culture for wellbeing:

> The problem is that there are no tools to spend this income in a way that will reflect on the Saudi's well-being in life. ... Entertainment and culture are very important to change the standard of living of a Saudi citizen in a short period of time.

Mohammed bin Rashid al Maktoum, the prime minister of the UAE and ruler of Dubai, explains plainly in his book on happiness that wellbeing reduces dissent (Al Maktoum 2017, 9):

> They [the people] understand that the government is working for their benefit, seeking to provide opportunities for them and for their children so they may be happy, and aiming to empower them with the tools and skills to fulfil their dreams. Could we conceive of the presence of any kind of hostility between governments and their people if the prime factor driving them all were achieving true happiness?

These statements suggest that the pursuit of leisure, entertainment, culture and wellbeing in authoritarian states is not purely for economic performance or reputational reasons. Rather autocrats believe, or at the very least, wish to appear to believe, that provision of entertainment, quality of life, and making people happy is a priority, and one reason is its political effect: reduction in hostility towards the government. I thus argue that state-provision of entertainment and leisure serves as a form of authoritarian control.

2.1 Existing explanations of authoritarian control

Hassan, Mattingly, and Nugent (2022) define political control as "any tactic through which the state seeks to gain compliance from society" (p. 157). Authoritarian states, in particular, have long been associated with a broad range of forms of control, as societal compliance ensures their longevity. How might we conceptualize the provision of leisure, entertainment and cultural goods as a form of control? These goods differ in many ways from our well-studied forms of control and cooptation – they are tangible, experiential, and make people feel good.

2.1.1 Repression

While repression often comes first to mind when thinking of authoritarian control – that is, use of actual or threatened restrictions and violence to keep masses in check (Davenport 2007) – autocrats are not threatening their populations with a good time. Participation in state-provided entertainment and leisure is voluntary, and nonparticipation carries no obvious penalty. Even state efforts to encourage citizens to spend more leisure time exercising (Vision 2030: Saudi Arabia 2017) do not deter political activity through threat or fear. A citizen who follows the state's encouragement to visit the gym and, as a result, spends less time criticizing the government on Twitter has been politically demobilized, but not directly repressed.

2.1.2 Material redistribution

The "bread" of bread and circuses – material redistribution – has been well studied as a tool of authoritarian control. Autocrats distribute rents, jobs, subsidies, patronage, and other material benefits to secure political support, with the form and targets of cooptation varying across regimes (Gandhi and Lust-Okar 2009). In PRI-era Mexico, access to state subsidies was linked to electoral support for the ruling party (Magaloni 2006). Elsewhere, regimes have coopted potential opponents through positions in sanctioned political institutions (Svolik 2012), educational and travel opportunities (Blaydes 2018), or parliamentary seats that provide access to rents (Blaydes 2010).

Such benefits can also bind citizens to the regime by making their material welfare dependent upon it. Albertus, Fenner, and Slater (2018) describe this as enmeshment: "regimes provide benefits in ways that reorient strategies of survival around a regime-controlled state" (p. 18). State employment can dampen opposition by creating a middle class economically dependent on the regime (Rosenfeld 2020), while access to consumption and middle-class lifestyles can sustain acquiescence toward authoritarian leadership (Wedeen 2019). Across these accounts, citizens' livelihoods, consumption patterns, and even survival become tied to the regime's longevity.

Entertainment and leisure, however differ in an important respect. Their political effects need not depend on material dependence or a quid pro quo between regime and citizen. Access to public parks, cinemas, concerts, sporting events, and other leisure opportunities are often made widely available rather than selectively allocated to particular populations or groups in exchange for political support. At the same time, leisure and entertainment are also not survival goods. Unlike a state salary, subsidized fuel, or housing, a concert or a public park's value is experiential.

Thus, while we understand relatively well how material redistribution and cooptation can facilitate authoritarian control, the provision of entertainment and leisure does not fit neatly within these existing accounts. Its political value may arise not because citizens become materially dependent on the regime, but because the regime changes how citizens spend their time and how they experience their everyday lives.

2.1.3 Manipulation

Regimes also exercise control by manipulating the information citizens receive through propaganda and censorship (Cantoni et al. 2017; Adena et al. 2015; Huang 2018; King, Pan, and Roberts 2013; Roberts 2018). Propaganda seeks to shape political attitudes through the content of the information it communicates. Stanley (2015), defines propaganda as speech that mobilizes ideals for a political purpose, while Rosenfeld and Wallace (2024) emphasizes that it disseminates of positive information or "spin." This communication can range from heavy-handed "hard" propaganda to subtler "soft" propaganda embedded in seemingly credible news or engaging cultural content (Huang 2018).

Propaganda communicates information intended to orient citizens toward a political object – that is to say, the message itself is the mechanism of influence. Nazi radio propaganda sought to generate support for the Nazi Party (Adena et al. 2015); Chinese propaganda can generate anger at foreign violations of Chinese sovereignty (Mattingly and Yao 2022). Entertainment and leisure need not communicate any such political message. A visit to the Louvre Abu Dhabi may improve one's evaluation of the government that made the museum possible, but the museum can also be enjoyed for the art resting within that is absent of state messaging. The political effect, in other words, need not reside in the content being consumed.

This distinction also separates entertainment provision from accounts of "informational autocracy," whereby regimes survive by manipulating citizens' beliefs about government performance (Guriev and Treisman 2019). State provision of entertainment and leisure certainly may impact citizens' beliefs about government performance, but these goods are not cheap talk – they are in many cases delivered upon and accessible to populations.

2.2 Entertainment and leisure as a form of control

Leisure and entertainment have long historical connections to social and political control. States have often sought to shape how citizens spend their nonworking time – and, in doing so, their relationship to political authority.

Rome's transformation from republic to empire hailed a massive increase in entertainment structures in the city. As Cornell and Lomas (2005, 58–59) argue, the construction of permanent entertainment venues may reflect recognition among elites of the political power of spectacle and amusement: "It is hardly likely that the idea of building entertainment venues suddenly occurred to the upper classes; rather it is more likely that the power such structures had on the city was recognised early and thus artificial constraints prevented their development." And as cited previously, Juvenal highlights how the pleasure and spectacle could substitute for political engagement in his reference to "panem et circenses" (Juvenal 2017, 44).

Leisure also became an explicit instrument of social governance in nineteenth-century Britain, when the state encouraged philanthropists to promote recreation among the middle and working classes as a "civilising strategy." This included the development of public parks, museums, and the promotion of football and rugby (Henry 2001). These opportunities for leisure went hand in hand with the modernization of society – disposable income and free time increased dramatically in the second half of the 19th century for members of the working class. In this case, provision of recreation provided a method of channeling newly available free time towards activities thought to encourage a particular social order.

Twentieth-century totalitarian regimes went further, deliberately incorporating leisure into projects of political mobilization and social integration. In Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia, leisure and entertainment were seen as opportunities to further enmesh populations to goals of the totalitarian state. These regimes' encouragement of physical activity and participation in sports served to "enforce patterns of thinking and to inculcate psychological characteristics that promoted the state's agenda" (Keys 2009, 395). In Germany, "All the various forms of communal recreation, from folk dancing amateur drama groups and sports competitions, to collective theatre, cinema and concert outgoings were fostered and controlled by the local leader of the party in order to draw the people away from 'non-committing' amusement and into the 'festive community'" (Unger 1974, 171). In this case, the political value of leisure lay in bringing activities that might otherwise remain outside the regime's reach under its control. Rather than distracting citizens from politics, state-provided leisure extended the regime's influence into citizens' social and political lives.

These examples suggest that states have long found leisure to be politically consequential, albeit through through different processes – diverting attention that might otherwise be directed toward politics, organizing citizens' time and their behavior, or structuring their relationship with the state. I propose three theoretically distinct pathways through which entertainment and leisure might impact political behavior in a modern authoritarian state.

2.2.1 H1: Affective pathway

Leisure and entertainment may serve to control populations by increasing positive affect, that is, a dominance of positive emotions or moods over negative ones (Diener 2009; Bradburn 1969). Affect pertains to the emotional experiences of an individual, including positive emotions (such as joy, gratitude, and contentment) and negative emotions (such as sadness, anxiety, and anger). Simply put, experiencing entertainment and leisure can make people feel happy (Bergsma 2010; Niemiec and Wedding 2013; Schulz et al. 2018).

Feeling happy can also inadvertently impact political attitudes and behaviors, in a way that can also be beneficial to the regime. Indeed, research on positive incidental affect – "affect that is unrelated to the decision at hand" (Loewenstein 2007, 619) – has been shown to bias political attitudes. Inducing positive affect in research subjects led to higher evaluations of a political candidate (Isbell and Wyer 1999), while experiencing a college sports team win has led to higher presidential approval rankings (Busby and Druckman 2018). From a behavioral perspective, research suggests that being happy can increase preference for the status quo in product choice (Yen and Chuang 2008), task completion (Shevchenko, Helversen, and Scheibehenne 2014), and vote (i.e., support for incumbent parties) (Ward 2019; Layard and De Neve 2023; Bagues and Esteve-Volart 2016). Happy individuals have also been found to be more likely to think about potential losses when making decisions (Isen and Geva 1987) and engage in self-preservation (Goudie et al. 2014).

H1 predicts that exposure to entertainment and leisure will raise positive affect and reduce political criticism for any citizen who experiences the affective treatment, including those who are otherwise unsympathetic to the government or to the policy itself. In other words, if entertainment operates by impacting mood, we would expect to see positive sentiment and criticism move together.

2.2.2 H2: Attention substitution pathway

In this mechanism, political content and non-political content compete for a fixed amount of attention. When more entertainment and leisure is available to engage with – to attend, discuss, or joke about – people will reallocate attention toward it and away from political topics generally. By offering entertainment and leisure activities for the masses, autocrats may in fact be attempting to encourage citizens to spend their time doing other things than wringing their hands thinking about the economy or jobs or the future of the country. Indeed, research has found that access to entertainment can reduce civic attitudes and participation (Durante, Pinotti, and Tesei 2019; Olken 2009).

Saudi's "Vision 2030" was announced in 2016 as a strategic plan to diversify the country's economy and reduce its dependency on oil; it was accompanied by cuts to public sector subsidies and the implementation of a value-added tax in 2018. Given the lack of popularity of these policies, making previously restricted entertainment options available might serve to shift the attention of populations to issues less politically sensitive. That is to say – entertainment and leisure may serve to distract citizens by leading them to spend their time online debating the merits of the latest Avengers' movie rather than the government's cuts to bonuses.

This mechanism is behavioral – shifts in attention do not require any change in underlying attitudes toward the regime. The prediction here is that the share of entertainment discourse will increase on days with more entertainment, while the share of non-entertainment-related political criticism will decrease.

2.2.3 H3: Evaluative pathway

Entertainment and leisure policies may also improve direct evaluation of government performance. In this pathway, entertainment changes political attitudes, not just behavior. Unlike H1, however, this happens through a change in direct evaluation of the government rather than in mood. Legitimacy, the likelihood that individuals will obey laws and leadership (Weber 2019), is derived from citizen belief that the government is effective and fair (Levi, Sacks, and Tyler 2009; Levi and Sacks 2009). Government responsiveness and efficacy do not belong purely to the realm of democracies – autocrats are responsive too, and citizens perceive them as such (Truex 2016; Lueders 2022; Tsai 2007). Thus, leisure and entertainment goods, just like other goods and services provided by the government to citizens and residents, can serve to signal effectiveness, trustworthiness, and responsiveness. In fact, theaters, parks, playgrounds and beaches are often more visible to the public than some traditional goods and services, like education or electrification. The Saudi state's visible delivery on a Vision 2030 promise may update citizens' cognitive judgment of regime competence (Guriev and Treisman 2019), independent of mood.

H3 therefore proposes an evaluative pathway. When governments visibly provide goods that citizens value, citizens may update their beliefs about government competence and responsiveness. In particular, it is citizens who value these policies who may become less critical of the government, as they are the segment who would evaluate its performance more favorably. This mechanism does not require entertainment to improve citizens' mood or divert their attention from politics – in this case, we would expect to see political criticism decline even in the absence of changes in affect or attention.

2.2.4 Empirical strategy for adjudicating between accounts

The pathways above are observationally distinct. H1, the affective pathway, predicts that entertainment will have a positive effect on mood and a negative effect on political criticism. More simply, we would expect people to feel happier and criticize the government less on days with more entertainment.

H2, the attention substitution pathway, predicts a reduction in political criticism and an increase in entertainment-related discourse online, among Twitter users broadly. That is, on days with more entertainment, users will tweet more about entertainment-related content (including criticism of the government with respect to the government), while non-entertainment-related political criticism will decrease.

H3, the evaluative pathway, predicts that provision of entertainment will decrease political criticism among supporters of the government's entertainment policy. That is to say, people who like entertainment and support its introduction in the country will be less likely to criticize the government when entertainment is provided.

Table 1 describes these predictions.

Table 1: Observable predictions of competing mechanisms

Outcome (Table 8 column)	H1: Affect	H2: Attention substitution	H3: Evaluation
Mood	↑	—	—
Political criticism	↓	↓	↓
Non-entertainment criticism	—	↓	—
Entertainment content	—	↑	—
Among whom?	Anyone whose mood rises	Anyone consuming entertainment	Only the entertainment-invested

Notes: H1 is distinguished from H3 by whether the mood and criticism responses occur in the same group. H2 is distinguished from both by column 3. If entertainment talk displaces political talk within a fixed budget of expression, then what survives of an author's criticism should be disproportionately about entertainment itself; if instead criticism falls because affect improved or because the author's relationship to the regime changed, the subject matter of what remains has no reason to shift.

3 Case selection: Saudi Arabia

Saudi Arabia is in many ways an outlier. It is an authoritarian state made wealthy by nature of being located on one of the world's largest oil reserves, its government is able to deliver public services and is generally perceived as effective and legitimate by its population (Schmidt-Feuerheerd 2023), and has a history of entertainment restriction, further outlined below. It has also seen an unprecedented investment in entertainment and leisure from 2017 onwards.

That said, these restrictions on entertainment provide a rare before-and-after case, given precise timing of entertainment events. As discussed below, Saudis are also extremely online, and the country has one of the highest per capita rates of Twitter usage. Given the challenges of collecting data in authoritarian settings, and particularly in Saudi Arabia, social media provides one of the best and few sources of political behavior. Saudi Arabia, thus, while unusual, provides a unique case to analyze the effects of the introduction of entertainment and leisure policies on a population in an authoritarian setting.

3.1 Political participation in Saudi Arabia

Saudi Arabia is an absolute monarchy. Political dissent is effectively outlawed, criticism or open discussion of the government or the royal family carry severe criminal penalties, and domestic media is heavily controlled by the state. Many authors have noted a further consolidation of power in Saudi Arabia since the installation of Mohamed bin Salman as Crown Prince in 2017, as the use of traditional power-sharing structures between princes, economic elites, and religious clerics has diminished (Lacroix 2019; Davidson 2021). While internal consensus building can be time-consuming and may lead to undesirable concessions – at odds with the speed and direction of Vision 2030 – as Kinninmont (2018) observes, "Power has now been centralized around the Salman branch of the family to a degree that is unprecedented for the Al-Saud" (p. 249).

That said, political participation certainly exists in Saudi, although perhaps not in the same form as defined in classic political science literature – Verba, Nie and Kim's 1978 study on political participation confines participation to strictly legal behaviors, for example. As public criticism of the state is against the law in Saudi Arabia, I turn to a broader definition of participation: "the public formulation of political opinion" (Albrecht 2008, p. 17).

Indeed, while Saudi government decision-making is an autocrat-led, top-down process, social media has provided a platform for citizens, particularly young, educated Saudis, to demand greater accountability and transparency on the part of the government (Thompson 2019). Given limits to freedom of speech and assembly, Twitter and other social media serve as a space for political expression and participation in Saudi Arabia (Noman, Faris, and Kelly 2015). Social media usage exploded in Saudi Arabia between 2017 and 2018, accounting for the largest annual growth rate of social media users in the world, an annual rate of 32%, compared the global average of 13% (Digital 2018 - Saudi Arabia 2018). In January 2018, there were 25 active million social media users in Saudi Arabia, representing 75% of the population. While WhatsApp, YouTube, and Facebook were the most popular social media apps at this point in time, 52% of social media users reported using Twitter (Digital 2018 - Saudi Arabia 2018).

The status of Saudi X/Twitter as a freewheeling open square for debate, however, has diminished over time. A series of crackdowns on activists, influences and authors of social media posts beginning in September 2017 through 2023 – including the arrests of non-influencer citizens for old tweets and the blurring of what language is acceptable (Nereim 2023) has dampened online political discourse according to some respondents. On the other hand, Pan and Siegel (2020) find that physical crackdowns on political activists in Saudi between 2010 and 2017 did not stifle political dissent in the country. As my data cover a period characterized by heightened restrictions on online expression, they capture political expression within a constrained information environment rather than the full range of Saudi users' underlying political beliefs and demands.

3.2 Entertainment in Saudi

Saudi's entertainment expansion has largely fallen under the purview of the General Entertainment Authority (al-Hayaa al-Amma lil-Tarfih), the government body responsible for regulating and developing entertainment in the country. Established by decree in 2016 by King Salman, the GEA has helped usher in public concerts, movie theaters, Comic Cons, WWE events, and theme parks since 2017 – that is to say, opportunities for accessible entertainment and leisure for the population.

The transformation represented a sharp departure from the preceding decades. Cinemas existed in Saudi Arabia as early as the 1930s, when US and European oil workers set up screens in residential compounds (Hudson 2024), and became more widely accepted during the 1960s and 1970s following King Faisal's negotiations with Islamic scholars (Shafik 2007). Following the 1979 siege of the Grand Mosque in Mecca by religious extremists, however, the government strengthened enforcement of conservative Islamic norms, requiring shops to close during prayer, discouraging women's participation in the workplace, and restricting women's roles in television and restaurants (Wright 2001; Rattner 1979). The disappearance of cinemas and live music performances is widely understood as part of this broader conservative turn (Hudson 2024).

Films and film festivals began to reappear during the 2000s, signaling King Abdullah's willingness to cautiously reopen the country's cultural sphere (Admon 2010; Freitag 2022). These efforts, however, encountered substantial resistance from the religious establishment. Saudi Arabia's first film festival, The First Visual Show Festival," held in Jeddah in 2006, avoided even using the word film" in its title because of religious sensitivities (Lacey 2006). In 2009, religious scholar Yusuf Al-Ahmad issued a fatwa against Prince Al-Waleed bin Talal and Waleed bin Ibrahim Al-Ibrahim, owners of prominent Saudi media groups Rotana and MBC, and urged the government to ban cinema, arguing that "cinema is a means used by hypocrites to promote Westernization, corrupt society, and distance it from the laws of God Almighty" ("Menahi' screening irks some' 2009; Admon 2010).[1]

The public screening of the Saudi-produced film "Menahi" illustrates the limits of this earlier opening. After screenings in Jeddah and Taif in December 2008, the film was shown at Riyadh's King Fahd Cultural Center in 2009. More than 300 men attended – women were excluded to avoid gender mixing – and the screening was announced only the day before because of concerns about conservative protests ('Ryad rediscovers commercial movies after decade-long blackout' 2009). Police ultimately removed 15 protesters who interrupted the showing, demanded that the theater be closed, and argued that movie screenings had brought earthquakes to western Saudi Arabia (Admon 2010; 'Ryad rediscovers commercial movies after decade-long blackout' 2009). That same year, the Jeddah Film Festival was cancelled at the last minute following pressure from the religious establishment (Child 2009). Cultural liberalization therefore predated Vision 2030, but these earlier efforts remained tentative, contested, and vulnerable to reversal.

[1]Yusuf Al-Ahmad was arrested in 2011 for criticizing the Interior Ministry's arbitrary detention of security suspects without charges or a fair trial. He was arrested again in 2017 as part of a wider government crackdown on Saudi religious figures and intellectuals.

The shift beginning in 2017 differed in both scale and state commitment. On December 11, 2017, the Ministry of Culture and Information announced that the government would begin licensing commercial theaters within 90 days. Although this was the first official announcement, the change had already been anticipated in Riyadh, where plans for theaters had begun appearing in several malls (Thompson 2019). The announcement assured the public that films would comply with Sharia provisions and Saudi ethical standards, while simultaneously emphasizing their potential contribution to economic diversification:

> Working in the film industry will have an economic impact that will increase the size of the media market, stimulate economic growth and diversification by contributing with more than 90 billion Saudi riyals (25 billion dollars) to the GDP, and create more than 30,000 permanent jobs, in addition to more than 130,000 temporary jobs by 2030.

US-based AMC announced a memorandum of understanding with the Saudi Public Investment Fund that same day and received the first license to operate a cinema in Saudi Arabia on April 4, 2018. Just two weeks later, on April 18, the first licensed commercial cinema opened in Riyadh's King Abdullah Financial District with a screening of Marvel's "Black Panther." UAE-based Vox Cinemas received a license later that month, announcing plans to open 110 screens across Saudi Arabia by the end of 2019.

In one respect, cinemas represented a relatively easy first step for the government, as movies themselves were already familiar to Saudi audiences. Many Saudis watched domestic and foreign films at home or traveled to Bahrain or Dubai to see them in theaters (Thompson 2019). What changed was not access to cultural content, but the ability to consume entertainment openly and collectively within Saudi Arabia.

The opening of cinemas accordingly generated considerable excitement, particularly among younger Saudis. As one young woman recalled, "I don't get easily excited, but people were excited!" (personal communication, October 15, 2024). Before the loosening of cultural restrictions beginning in 2017, opportunities for public recreation were strikingly limited. As Thompson (2019, 251) writes:

> For a young man, free-time options are limited: it is a case of going to cheap restaurants and cafes, then roaming around the city in their cars. Other options include going to the mall (if they are allowed in), going to the Corniche or the beach (if they do not get moved on), going to the gym (if they can afford it) or participating in illegal activities such as drifting.

Cinemas offered an escape not only through the entertainment provided by films themselves, but by creating new spaces in which friends could socialize publicly (Thompson 2019). As one young man explained, "It's better than going to someone's garden, sitting around and just looking at each other" (personal communication, October 14, 2024). The significance of entertainment reforms thus extended beyond the introduction of new cultural products, as they expanded the activities, spaces, and social experiences available in everyday Saudi life.

3.3 The Political Stakes of Entertainment Reform

Entertainment in authoritarian regimes, and Saudi in particular, has the potential to both strengthen and weaken political control. On the one hand, entertainment has been found to act as a stabilizing force for authoritarian states. East Germans who had access to West German television programming were more supportive of the East German regime than those without (Kern and Hainmueller 2009) – the authors theorize that the entertainment of TV content provided a form of escapism for East Germans, making daily life under communism more tolerable. In Syria, Wedeen (2019) argues that Bashar al-Asad's offer of a neoliberal social contract to citizens won over the middle class by providing access to consumerism and entertainment – a taste of the "good life" – in exchange for political acquiescence.

This logic was particularly relevant in Saudi Arabia because of the country's young population and limited opportunities for both employment and recreation. In 2015, 50% of the population of Saudi Arabia was estimated to be under the age of 25, and 35% under the age of 15 (Al-Kibsi et al. 2015). At the same time, widespread dissatisfaction with opportunities for youth employment was further exacerbated by the 2014 drop in oil prices given the economy's dependence on oil revenues – the government was simply no longer able to offer the number of public sector jobs available to earlier generations (Kinninmont 2018; Grand and Wolff 2020; Hubbard 2016). As Thompson (2019) notes, the shortage of entertainment for young Saudis, "coupled with enforced gender segregation, creates a potent and potentially explosive combination of boredom and frustration. The lack of employment opportunities, along with social exclusion and sexual frustration, are blamed for causing this explosive mix" (p. 251). Indeed, being young and unemployed has been linked with social unrest, protest participation, (Yeung and Yang 2020; Cantoni et al. 2022; Beissinger, Jamal, and Mazur 2015; Chenoweth et al. 2022) and even domestic terrorism (Adelaja and George 2020). A majority of protesters in the 2011 Tunisian uprising, for example, were unemployed (Beissinger, Jamal, and Mazur 2015).

Thus, in Saudi, the novel provision of entertainment and leisure may have served as a response to the young and unemployed facing both economic frustration and boredom. Creating spaces for leisure and entertainment could make daily life more enjoyable even in the absence of political liberalization or employment prospects by increasing citizens' satisfaction with everyday life or redirecting their attention away from political or economic grievances.

On the other hand, entertainment liberalization also carried political risks. Restrictions on public entertainment were embedded in Saudi Arabia's longstanding alliance between the Al-Saud ruling family and the country's religious establishment. The origins of this alliance trace to 1744, when tribal leader Muhammad bin Saud formed a pact with religious reformer Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab. The Saudi ruler agreed to support Abd al-Wahhab's religious project, while the latter recognized the Saudi amir's political leadership (Al-Rasheed 2010, 16). The religious doctrine associated with this alliance – commonly referred to as Wahhabism – opposed many forms of music, dance, mixed-gender socializing, and other secular cultural practices as incompatible with religious piety (Al-Rasheed 2010; Wagemakers, Kanie, and Geel 2012).

The relationship between the ruling family and religious conservatives has never been frictionless. Saudi rulers have repeatedly confronted challenges from religious movements when political or social modernization appeared to violate established religious commitments. Abd al-Aziz bin Saud's tribal militia, the Ikhwan, who helped the future king's reconquest of the Saudi state, turned against him in 1929 when his accommodation of regional powers conflicted with their commitment to continued jihad (Lacroix and Holoch 2011). The 1979 occupation of the Grand Mosque in Mecca by religious extremists reflected dissatisfaction with the decadence and social changes brought on by the oil boom and supported by the ruling family (Wagemakers, Kanie, and Geel 2012). In 1990, the Saudi government's decision to invite foreign forces – mostly American – onto Saudi soil following Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait was deemed controversial by the Sahwa Islamist movement and led to vocal opposition and mass protests (Lacroix and Holoch 2011). Entertainment liberalization thus occurred against a history in which top-down changes to Saudi social and religious life could become politically consequential.

Moreover, restrictions themselves can generate political support. While current Saudi leadership has made recent efforts to develop a secular national identity (Al-Rasheed 2010; Alamer 2022), "religion (primarily the Wahhabi version of Sunni Islam) has played a prominent role not only in moulding the individual's private and collective identities but also in consolidating his national values" in Saudi (Nevo 1998, 35). More generally, Esberg (2020) shows that authoritarian regimes may censor popular culture not only to suppress political expression but also to satisfy constituencies that prefer such restrictions. Saudi Arabia's entertainment restrictions may have served not only as manifestations of religious doctrine, but as benefits to conservative citizens and signals of the regime's religio-political legitimacy. Removing them risked alienating those constituencies for whom cultural restriction was valuable.

In short, the introduction of entertainment in Saudi Arabia reflected a balancing act between addressing the needs of younger, restive populations and the possible downsides of angering traditional, conservative elements of the country who might see its provision as incompatible with the Kingdom's identity and legitimacy. Given that movie theaters did indeed open, the benefits of introducing entertainment – leisure for a growing youth population looking for jobs and the creation of jobs themselves – were likely worth the potential risks of angering the parts of the population who would be opposed to its introduction on the part of the regime.

4 Data

The analysis below is conducted on approximately 22 million tweets geotagged in Saudi Arabia with an identifiable location based on a Twitter "place" identifier between November 1, 2017 and July 25, 2019, representing approximately 400,000 unique users. These dates were originally selected for their proximity to the announcement of the cinema rollout and the opening of the first theaters.

While the full corpus of tweets collected amounts to 31 million, I remove Saudi news, advertising, and government accounts from the dataset, as these are not individual users whose emotion or political sentiment I aim to capture. I drop all non-Arabic tweets to ensure consistency in language processing and exclude users who post more than 72 times per day to filter likely bots and advertisers (robustness checks excluding users who post more than 50 times and 25 times a day are included in the Appendix). In this remaining data, the average user tweets roughly three times per day.

I retain both retweets and replies in the dataset. Retweets reflect endorsement or agreement from the user on average, and replies, though sometimes short or context-dependent, still contain affective information. Prior research indicates that duplication and resharing are common on Twitter: in the United States, 25 percent of users produce 97 percent of all content (McClain et al. 2021), and similar concentration patterns appear in Middle Eastern Twitter use (Jones and Abrahams 2018).

4.1 Tweets as a measure of sentiment and political behavior

Given the use Twitter data in this study as a proxy for individual sentiment and political engagement, a pertinent question to address is how representative these online expressions are of real world emotional sentiment and political behavior. Does political and emotional sentiment expressed on Twitter have any real world consequence?

While most literature comes from examination of Twitter use in the United States, there is strong evidence that suggests that tweets are in fact representative of real world attitudes and behaviors. In terms of political participation, DiGrazia et al. (2013) find that the amount of attention a US congressional candidate receives on Twitter relative to their opponent is significantly associated with their vote share in a random sample of tweets in the 1-3 months prior to 795 competitive races in the 2010 and 2012 U.S. congressional elections – a one standard deviation increase in tweet share is associated with a 0.71 increase in vote share. In a study of 2011 gubernatorial elections in the US, research finds that strong partisans and those who have high levels of traditional forms of political participation are most likely to tweet about politics, suggesting that those who were already politically inclined offline are simply bringing their activities online (Bekafigo and McBride 2013). The sentiment expressed in geotagged tweets has been found to strongly correlate with other sentiment measures at the geographic level, such as the Gallup Wellbeing Index at the U.S. state level (Mitchell et al. 2013). In other words, happiness levels in tweets, as measured by machine learning algorithms, align closely with happiness levels determined through traditional survey methods at the state level. Language and sentiment on Twitter have been geographically associated with other various real-world outcomes in the United States. For instance, regions with lower obesity rates tend to have more tweets discussing healthy food and exercise (Gore, Diallo, and Padilla 2015). Similarly, extreme temperatures, whether very cold or hot, have been linked to increased expressions of negative sentiment on Twitter (Baylis 2020).

In short, research on US Twitter/X data suggests a correlation between online expressions and offline attitudes and actions, with evidence suggesting online sentiment and political activity mirrors offline engagement. That said, the generalizability of these findings to the Saudi context is not a certainty, particularly given restrictions on the freedom of expression in Saudi.

4.2 Tweet classification and model fine-tuning

To classify both the emotional and political valence of individual tweets, I finetune two supervised classifiers based on SaudiBERT (Qarah 2024), a large language model pretrained exclusively on text in the Saudi dialect. SaudiBERT was trained on the largest Saudi dialectical corpora currently in the literature, including 141 million tweets and 15 GB of data from Saudi online fora. The tweet corpus retained emojis, punctuation, and diacritics, and was not subject to stemming, lemmatization or any other text normalization, making it particularly suited for analysis of tweet sentiment expressed in casual online discourse in Saudi.

4.2.1 Emotional sentiment classifier

The emotional sentiment classifier predicts whether the author of a tweet feels positive, neutral, or negative affect, classifying the author's immediate emotional state rather than their evaluative judgment of a topic. I finetune SaudiBERT on a hand-labeled sample of 2,451 tweets (80% training, 20% test) drawn from the full corpus. Tweets were independently labeled by at least two coders of which at least one was Saudi following a detailed coding protocol (Appendix H). Coders were instructed to infer the emotional tone of the author at the time of writing, not the sentiment of the tweet, based on language or topic being discussed.

Inter-coder reliability was evaluated on a subset of approximately 500 tweets, yielding 75% raw agreement, class-specific F1 scores of 0.65–0.79, and a Cohen's κ of 0.40. Disagreement primarily occurred between neutral and weakly valenced tweets, reflecting the inherent difficulty of distinguishing subtle affective states. Agreement for clearly positive and negative tweets – the focus of the main analyses – was substantially higher, suggesting that the classifier's estimates of emotional polarity are conservative and unlikely to overstate effect sizes.

4.2.2 Political criticism classifier

The political classifier distinguishes between politically critical and non-critical tweets. A tweet is labeled politically critical if the author expresses dissatisfaction, grievance, or disapproval – directly or indirectly – toward the Saudi state, its leadership, or its policies (see Appendix I for the coding guide).

Training data were developed iteratively. All hashtags from the full tweet corpus were extracted, and with the support of a Saudi research assistant any hashtags potentially associated with political content/discontent were identified (Appendix J). All tweets containing these hashtags were retrieved, and a random subset of 2,000 tweets was manually labeled by a Saudi coder and reviewed by the author. This set was then used to fine-tune an initial classifier. The resulting model was then applied to the full dataset to identify candidate critical tweets, from which an additional 2,410 tweets were sampled, audited, and relabeled. The final classifier was finetuned on the combined 4,410 (80% training, 20% test).

To reduce false positives in politically sensitive text, I prioritized precision over recall when tuning the decision threshold for classification (Appendix N). I ultimately selected a threshold of 0.90, at which the classifier achieved precision = 0.91, recall = 0.68, and F1 = 0.78 on the held-out test set. This conservative decision rule ensures that only tweets with very high model-estimated probability of criticism are coded as politically critical. Inspection of misclassified cases showed that false positives were often ambiguous service complaints or satire, while false negatives involved veiled or coded dissent. Given this error structure, any measurement bias should attenuate rather than inflate estimated treatment effects.

Table 2: Performance of Fine-Tuned SaudiBERT Classifiers on Test Data

Model / Class	Accuracy	Precision	Recall	F1	Support	Eval Loss
Panel A: Emotional Sentiment (negative/neutral/positive)
Negative	–	0.89	0.84	0.86	113	0.48
Neutral	–	0.80	0.82	0.81	83
Positive	–	0.88	0.90	0.89	180
Macro average	0.86	0.86	0.85	0.85	376
Panel B: Political Sentiment (non-critical/critical)
Base model	0.89	0.84	0.73	0.78	117	0.54
Thresholded model ($p_{\text{crit}} \geq 0.90$)	–	0.91	0.68	0.78	–	–

Notes: Metrics computed on held-out test sets. The emotional sentiment classifier distinguishes positive, neutral, and negative author affect. The political classifier distinguishes politically critical from non-critical tweets toward the Saudi state. All models are fine-tuned using SaudiBERT (Qarah 2024). Thresholded model applies a decision cutoff of $p_{\text{crit}} \geq 0.90$, prioritizing precision (0.91) over recall (0.68).

4.3 Entertainment and Leisure

I create a manual database of all entertainment and leisure activities offered by the Saudi government in Saudi Arabia during the time period of my Twitter dataset. This database was built by Saudi-based RAs and myself relying on Arabic and English-language news sources, social media posts, tweets from the Saudi Government General Entertainment Authority (GEA)'s @Enjoy_SA Twitter account, and the GEA's calendar of events on its enjoy.sa website and former roznamah.sa site, accessed via the Wayback machine (see Appendix K for the list of events).

Table 3: Summary Statistics: GEA Entertainment Events

Variable	Mean	SD	Range	N
Event-entry level
Event duration (days)	8.13	18.34	[1, 267]	863
Distinct cities with ≥ 1 event				42
City-day level
Events per city-day, conditional on ≥ 1 event	2.16	2.21	[1, 22]	3,253
Author-day-city level
Events per author-day-city observation	1.73	2.62	[0, 22]	7,518,659
75th / 90th percentile thresholds			[3, 5]
Share of observations with ≥ 1 event				50.5%

Note: Events per city-day is calculated among city-days with at least one event. Events per author-day-city observation is calculated over all observations in the analysis panel, with zero events assigned to no-event days. This is the measure used to construct the `high_event_day` threshold.

Table 4: Overview of Data Sources

Dataset	Type	Size
GEA event data	Constructed event dataset (hand-collected from online archives, news and social media posts)	863 unique events
Twitter corpus	Naturally occurring social media dataset (collected via Twitter Academic API, cleaned of bots/ads/news)	22.4 million tweets (2017–2019)
Political sentiment classification	Human-labeled subjective classification (author-centered political stance toward Saudi state and policy: politically critical or non-critical)	4,410 tweets (training + validation set)
Emotional sentiment classification	Human-labeled subjective classification (author-centered emotional valence: positive, neutral or negative)	2,451 tweets (training + validation set)

4.4 Data limitations

This dataset does not represent the tweets of a random sample of Saudi citizens and residents. According to market research by HootSuite, approximately 52% of the population in Saudi Arabia reported themslves as active Twitter users in January 2018 (Digital 2018 - Saudi Arabia 2018). Recent data on Saudi Twitter/X users follows global trends and suggests that X users skew male and between the ages of 29-49. At the same time, geotagging tweets is not a default practice for Twitter users. The geographic information that comes with the "Place ID" is opt-in – users are given the option to assign a pre-defined geographic location to a post from a list of nearby locations (within approximately a 200-meter radius) provided by Twitter prior to posting their tweet. These locations can include countries, cities, neighborhoods, landmarks, and other points of interest.[2] Research finds that less than 1% of all tweets are geotagged, and the most frequent type is of place attribute is "city" (Kruspe et al. 2021).

Additionally, there appears to be a strong homophily effect – users tend to connect with friends who have similar geotagging behaviors (Huang and Carley 2020), suggesting that this dataset may be made up of a particular set of users. Systematic comparison of geotag users and non-geotag users in the United States finds that these users are indeed different across a majority of features captured by Twitter/X (Karami et al. 2021). In the US, geotag users tend to have been on Twitter for longer than non-geotag users, share more personal information in their bios, use the pronoun "I" more often in their tweets, use more positive language, and have different topics of interest than non-geotag users (who tweet more about work and money). While these findings are US-specific, it certainly highlights the possibility in differences between Saudis on Twitter who choose to geotag and those who choose not to.

[2]See https://help.x.com/en/using-x/post-location.

Similarly, some research finds that people who use Twitter to discuss politics are different. In a study of US and Spanish Twitter in the 2012 and 2011 elections, respectively, Barberá and Rivero (2015) find that people tweeting about politics tend to be male, live in urban areas and have extreme ideological perspectives.

Given the end of Twitter's Academic Track API, further exploration of the characteristics of users in this dataset is not feasible given limitations to accessing X data for researchers. However, at the very least, we should consider these tweets to represent Saudis who use Twitter.

That said, these selection concerns are consequential for external validity – the ability to generalize point estimates to the Saudi population as a whole – rather than for the internal validity of the effects identified here. My empirical strategy relies on user and time fixed effects, thus identification comes from within-user changes in behavior around policy or event dates, not from cross-sectional comparisons between geotagging and non-geotagging users. Time-invariant characteristics that make geotaggers a distinctive subpopulation are differenced out by the user fixed effects (although they do bias the level of any outcome variable in the sample). The relevant threat to this design is not that the sample is unrepresentative in levels, but rather that the treatment effect itself might be heterogeneous across geotaggers and non-geotaggers in ways correlated with the decision to geotag – e.g., if geotagging users are more expressive by disposition and thus more responsive to a happiness policy or entertainment event, the estimated effect would represent an upper bound rather than an average effect. Absent a way to observe non-geotagging users' behavior, this possibility cannot be ruled out directly, but it implies a specific and testable form of bias rather than a wholesale rejection of the findings, and the results should accordingly be interpreted as evidence of within-person marginal responses among Twitter users who geotag, rather than as a claim about population-level shifts in Saudi public opinion.

4.5 Summary statistics

Table 5 and Figures 1 and 2 summarize the main features of the dataset (additional tables can be found in Appendix G). The sample includes roughly 22.4 million tweets geotagged in Saudi Arabia between November 2017 and July 2019. Of these, about 19 million tweets (85%) include a precise city-level place ID spanning 175 distinct cities. Political criticism, as classified by the finetuned SaudiBERT model, is rare – only 0.6 percent of tweets are labeled as politically critical.

Author level. Panel A of Table 5 shows that authors in the dataset are highly heterogeneous in both emotional tone and activity. The average author tweets with a slightly positive sentiment (mean = 0.24 on a –1 to +1 scale). About 9 percent of users have ever posted at least one tweet classified as politically critical.

Table 5: Summary Statistics by Level of Analysis

Variable	Mean	SD	Min	Max
Panel A: Author Level (N = 400,286 authors)
Mean sentiment	0.24	0.49	-1	1
Ever posted critical tweet	0.09	0.28	0	1
Tweets per author	55.91	216.42	1	13,209
Panel B: Day Level (N = 633 days)
Mean sentiment	0.19	0.05	0.05	0.55
Mean share critical	0.01	0.01	0.001	0.063
Tweets per day	35,357.69	5,375.70	4,298	60,388
Unique authors per day	12,891.90	1,788.23	2,388	20,216
Panel C: Tweet Level (N = 22,381,416 tweets)
Sentiment valence	0.19	0.83	-1	1
Political criticism	0.01	0.08	0	1

Notes: Sentiment valence ranges from −1 (negative) to 1 (positive). Political criticism is an indicator equal to one for tweets classified as politically critical.

Most authors contribute infrequently – the median author tweets only a few times, while a small subset of frequent users drives much of the overall volume.

Day level. Panel B shows that daily average sentiment fluctuates within a narrow range (mean = 0.19, SD = 0.05), suggesting stable aggregate mood on Saudi Twitter. The share of tweets classified as politically critical averages 0.01, or 1 percent, ranging from 0.1 percent on calm days to over 6 percent on the most critical days. Daily tweet volume averages 35,358, with roughly 12,892 unique authors per day.

Tweet level. Panel C summarizes the full tweet distribution. Sentiment valence is centered around 0.19 (SD = 0.83). The extreme skew in political criticism – 1 percent of 22.4 million – illustrates the rarity of overtly critical speech in Saudi online discourse wihtin this corpus.

5 H1: Affective pathway

Before testing H1 – entertainment makes people happy and less likely to negatively opine online about the government – I first explore the plausibility of an association between happiness and political expression. Is there evidence to support the idea that autocrats can benefit from making their populations happier?

5.1 Mood and political criticism

I estimate a series of descriptive regressions relating mood to political criticism, at both the author-day and day level.

Table 6: Mood and political criticism

	Any criticism		Share critical
	(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)
Panel A. Author-day level
Mood (z)	-1.005		-0.750
	(0.008)		(0.006)
Mood (z, within author)		-0.894		-0.643
		(0.008)		(0.006)
Baseline mean of DV (pp)	1.17	1.17	0.65	0.65
Observations	8,160,571	8,160,571	8,160,571	8,160,571
Within R^2	0.008	0.008	0.011	0.009
Author fixed effects	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes
Day fixed effects	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes
Panel B. Day level
Mood (z)			-0.178	-0.104
			(0.032)	(0.030)
				[0.031]
Baseline mean of DV (pp)			0.61	0.61
Observations			633	633
R^2			0.089	0.331
Day-of-week fixed effects			No	Yes
Month fixed effects			No	Yes

Notes: Outcomes are in percentage points. Any criticism is an indicator for posting at least one politically critical tweet; Share critical is the fraction of the author's tweets that day classified as politically critical. Mood is the mean emotional valence across all of an author's tweets that day, standardized; column (2) and (4) standardize within author so each is measured on their own scale. Panel A includes author and day fixed effects with standard errors clustered by author (in parentheses). Panel B collapses all tweets to one observation per calendar day; heteroskedasticity-robust standard errors in parentheses, Newey-West ($L = 6$) in brackets. $^{*}p < 0.10$, $^{}p < 0.05$, $^{}p < 0.01$.

5.1.1 Author-day level

Panel A of Table 6 estimates

$$\text{political_criticism}_{it} = \beta_1 \, \text{mood}(z)_{it} + \alpha_i + \alpha_t + \varepsilon_{it} \tag{1}$$

with author and date fixed effects and standard errors clustered by author and date, where mood is the standardized mean emotional valence across all of an author's tweets on day t.

Author fixed effects absorb time-invariant heterogeneity across users, such as political disposition, location, tweeting intensity, and any author-specific bias in how the sentiment and criticism classifiers rate an individual's writing style. Thus β_1 is identified from within-author variation over time rather than from comparisons between chronically positive and chronically negative users. Date fixed effects absorb national shocks common to all users on a given day, including news events, religious and national holidays, and any secular drift in the composition of the Twitter sample. The coefficient therefore reflects whether an author is more politically critical than usual on days when their mood is worse than usual, net of that day's national average.

A one standard deviation increase in author-day mood is associated with a 1 percentage point decline in the probability of an author posting any critical tweet that day (column 1), and a 0.75 percentage point decline in the share of that day's tweets classified as critical (column 4), from a baseline mean of 1.15 and 0.64 percentage points respectively. These are substantively large associations – in both cases, the estimated decline is comparable in magnitude to the baseline level of political criticism itself. The result is unchanged when log(tweets) is added as a control (see Table 15 in the appendix) and holds when mood is standardized within-author, so that the estimate reflects an author's day-to-day deviations from their own typical mood rather than cross-author differences in disposition (columns 2 and 4). The sample includes 8,173,025 author-day observations.

5.1.2 Day level

Panel B collapses the corpus to one observation per calendar day (632 days) and relates the day's standardized mood to the day's overall share of critical tweets. The base specification (column 1) yields a coefficient of -0.18 percentage points per SD of mood; adding day-of-week and month fixed effects to absorb calendar and seasonal structure (Eid, Ramadan, and other recurring high-mood periods) reduces this to -0.10 percentage points (column 4, robust to Newey-West standard errors with $L = 6$), against a baseline mean of 0.60 percentage points. The day-level estimate is smaller than the author-day estimate, as expected once seasonal mood variation is absorbed, but the sign and significance are unchanged.

5.1.3 Summary and identification caveats

Together, these results show that mood is strongly and inversely related to political criticism at both the individual and aggregate level, and that the relationship survives controls for tweet volume, within-author standardization, and calendar/seasonal fixed effects. That is to say, happier people appear to be less politically critical.

These are of course, correlations, and not causal effects. A causal interpretation of β_1 would require that no unobserved factors jointly affect mood and political criticism. The fixed-effects specification addresses this concern only partially by accounting for stable differences across authors and common shocks across dates. Some of this relationship may be mechanical, since critical tweets often use negative language. However, the relationship also appears when mood is averaged across tweets, suggesting it is not purely mechanical.

5.2 Entertainment, mood, and political criticism

I now turn to the effect of entertainment on political criticism, and test whether it functions through affect. Does state provision of entertainment make people happier and correspondingly reduce political criticism?

To test this, I estimate a two-way fixed-effects model that exploits variation in the timing and location of state-sponsored entertainment events. I construct an author-day-city panel from the full Twitter corpus and merge it with the GEA event database described in Section 4.3. A city-day is coded as a high event day if the number of concurrent entertainment events falls at or above the top quartile of the event-count distribution across city-days with at least one event corresponding to three or more events (Table 3). Just over half of author-day observations occur on days with at least one event in the author's city. I estimate:

where i indexes authors, c cities, and t dates. Author fixed effects absorb all time-invariant differences across users, including their baseline propensity to criticize and, for the large majority who tweet from a single city, fixed characteristics of their city. Date fixed effects absorb national shocks common to all cities on a given day, including political events, holidays, and nationwide changes in the Twitter sample. Standard errors are two-way clustered by city and date.

Identification therefore comes from differences in entertainment intensity across cities on the same date and within cities over time. More concretely, β_1 compares an author's political expression on days when their city hosts three or more concurrent GEA events with the same author's expression on lower-event days, holding constant national conditions on those dates. Treatment repeatedly switches on and off across cities rather than being permanently adopted.

The coefficient is best interpreted as an intent-to-treat effect. I observe the availability of entertainment in an author's city, not whether that author attended an event. Because only a fraction of residents attend any particular event, estimates capture the average effect of greater city-level entertainment availability and will likely be attenuated relative to effects among those directly exposed.

Unfortunately, a conventional leads-and-lags event-study design is not suited to the introduction of entertainment in Saudi Arabia. GEA events last an average of 8.1 days (SD = 18.3), with some lasting as long as 267 days, making discrete treatment onsets difficult to define. Events also overlap heavily – conditional on hosting an event, city-days average 2.16 concurrent events and host as many as 22. A "pre-treatment" period for one event may therefore overlap with exposure to another. Finally, treatment is recurring rather than absorbing – 42 cities cycle repeatedly between higher and lower levels of entertainment over the twenty-month study period. Thus there is no clean, recurring event onset or meaningful never-treated comparison group from which to estimate a conventional dynamic event-study specification (Roth et al. 2023). Equation (2) instead estimates the within-author association between local entertainment intensity and political expression on the same day.

Notes: OLS estimates of Equation (2). All specifications include author and date fixed effects. Standard errors, reported in parentheses, are two-way clustered by city and date. High event day is an indicator equal to one when the number of concurrent entertainment events in the author's city is at or above the 75th percentile of the city-day distribution (three or more events). Mood (z) is standardized to have mean zero and standard deviation one; Mood (mean) retains its native $[-1, 1]$ scale. Any criticism is an indicator for whether the author posted at least one politically critical tweet that day, and Share critical is the share of the author's tweets that day classified as politically critical. Coefficients and outcome means for Any criticism and Share critical are reported in percentage points (outcomes multiplied by 100). * $p < 0.05$,  $p < 0.01$,  $p < 0.001$.

Table 7 provides no support for H1, the affective pathway. That is to say, entertainment does not appear to be making people happier on average. High-event days have no effect on average mood. The precision of this estimate allows me to rule out even very small improvements in affect; the upper bound of the confidence interval is approximately 0.001 standard deviations. The estimate using sentiment on its native scale is similarly small and negative ($\hat{\beta} = -0.003$, SE $= 0.002$).

At the same time, political criticism does not decline on days with more entertainment. In fact, high-event days are associated with a 0.034 percentage-point increase in the probability of posting any criticism ($p = 0.185$), rather than the decrease predicted by H1. The 95% confidence interval rules out declines larger than approximately 0.016 percentage points, or 1.4% of the outcome mean. The share of critical tweets likewise increases by 0.030 percentage points, equivalent to 4.7% of its mean ($p = 0.046$). Taken together, these estimates suggest that increased availability of state-sponsored entertainment neither improves average mood nor reduces political criticism on average. If anything, the point estimate on critical share suggests that a very small increase in mean criticism, which I discuss further below.

Table 8: Entertainment Events and Attention Substitution

Notes: Estimates of Equation (2). All specifications include author and date fixed effects. Standard errors, reported in parentheses, are two-way clustered by city and date. High event day is an indicator equal to one when the number of concurrent entertainment events in the author's city is at or above the 75th percentile of the city-day distribution (three or more events). Column 1 reports OLS estimates for the log number of tweets posted by an author that day. Column 2 reports the share of an author's tweets classified as entertainment-related, and Column 3 reports the share classified as politically critical but not entertainment-related; coefficients and outcome means in these columns are reported in percentage points (outcomes multiplied by 100). Column 4 reports fixed-effects Poisson estimates of the number of non-entertainment critical tweets, with the log of total author-day tweets included as an exposure offset. The coefficient in Column 4 is reported on the log-rate scale; exponentiating it gives the proportional change in the rate of non-entertainment critical tweeting. Authors who never post a non-entertainment critical tweet do not contribute to the fixed-effects Poisson estimate. * $p < 0.05$,  $p < 0.01$,  $p < 0.001$.

6 H2: Attention substitution

The above results suggest that entertainment does not have an impact on political expression through citizens' mood. I thus turn to consider H2 – whether entertainment reduces political criticism by redirecting attention away from politics. If state-sponsored entertainment occupies citizens' time and attention, we might expect days with more entertainment events to increase engagement with entertainment while reducing political expression unrelated to entertainment.

Table 8 tests these predictions using the same two-way fixed-effects specification in Equation 2. I first examine whether entertainment events change how authors allocate their attention on Twitter – on days with more entertainment, are people talking more about entertainment? Indeed, high-event days are associated with a 0.062 percentage-point increase in the share of tweets about entertainment. Relative to the sample mean of 0.137 percent, this represents an increase of approximately 45 percent. Thus, the event measure does appear to capture a meaningful shift in attention toward entertainment. At the same time, there is no evidence that entertainment draws users away from Twitter altogether. Total tweeting increases by approximately 0.9 percent on high-event days, although the estimate is not statistically significant at conventional levels ($p = 0.097$).

The key test of H2 is whether attention to entertainment displaces political criticism. It does not. On high-event days, the share of non-entertainment tweets that are politically critical slightly increases by 0.029 percentage points ($p = 0.050$). A Poisson model accounting for overall tweet volume similarly finds no decline in the rate of non-entertainment criticism ($\hat{\beta} = 0.010$, $p = 0.708$), with the 95 percent confidence interval ruling out declines larger than approximately 4 percent.

Together, these results suggest that on average, entertainment attracts attention without crowding out political criticism. Users talk more about entertainment on high-event days, but not at the expense of critical political expression. The results therefore provide little support for H2.

7 H3: Evaluative pathway

The preceding sections suggest that the provision of entertainment does not reduce political criticism on average – not through increased positive mood nor through diversion of attention away from political issues. A third possibility is that citizens respond politically to the provision of entertainment because they value the policy itself. Under this evaluative pathway, H3, entertainment functions like other valued government goods and services. Citizens who welcome its provision may update their evaluations of the government and thus be less critical.

This mechanism implies heterogeneity. The same entertainment policy may generate political goodwill among citizens who value its provision while producing little benefit, or dissatisfaction among those who oppose it. The average effect of entertainment as reported above may thus conceal different responses across citizens with different underlying preferences. H3 consequently predicts that reductions in political criticism should be concentrated among citizens who previously expressed support for the expansion of entertainment.

I test this implication by exploiting Twitter content regarding Saudi Arabia's entertainment. Before estimating the effects of entertainment events, I classify users according to whether their prior tweets expressed support for or opposition to the expansion of entertainment.

7.1 Classifying entertainment supporters and opponents

Entertainment was not uniformly welcomed in Saudi, as highlighted in Section 3, and the mechanisms hypothesized in Section 2.2 make different predictions for those who embraced its introduction, and those who did not. H3 suggests that the effects of the introduction of entertainment will be concentrated among those who value what the state has delivered. Thus, to evaluate H3, we must first distinguish who supported the introduction of entertainment and who did not.

I identify all hashtags and handles in the corpus relating to cinema, the General Entertainment

Authority, Saudi festivals, and concerts (Appendix 3), and extract every user who uses one of them prior to April 18, 2018, the opening of the first public cinema in Riyadh. From a sample of each such user's entertainment-tagged tweets, I classify (with the help of a Saudi RA) the author as an entertainment lover (expressed enthusiasm for cinemas, concerts, or participation in entertainment), an entertainment hater (expressed displeasure or anger about entertainment in Saudi Arabia), or unclear (entertainment is mentioned without a valenced position). Table 9 provides classification examples. Users in the corpus who never mention entertainment before the cutoff are unlabeled and serve as the reference category throughout.

Two features of this labeling exercise are of note. First, the April 2018 cutoff is later than the December 2017 announcement of the introduction of new cinemas, and the introduction of new entertainment more broadly (the earliest concert we identify is a Mohamed Abdo concert in Taif in October 2016). Given the date limitations of the Twitter corpus, the cinema announcement-date cutoff yielded too few users with prior entertainment activity to support classification. Thus, some users classified before April 2018 had certainly already been exposed to entertainment events. Because users are classified from their own tweets, a classification tweet posted during the panel could itself be an outcome observation, or a reaction to an entertainment event that also enters as treatment, making group assignment endogenous to treatment. Section below discusses results restricted to author-days after the April 2018 cutoff.

Second, labeled users are a small and unusual subpopulation, constituting 716 haters and 1,238 lovers, against the approximately 400,000 authors in the corpus. These are individuals who are sufficiently invested in entertainment policy to have tweeted about it publicly. The estimates below thus identify how entertainment events move the political expression of citizens with a publicly declared prior stake in entertainment, relative to citizens with no observed stake.

Table 10 summarizes the two labeled groups. Lovers are more numerous and more active, but haters are far more political: 83 percent of haters posted at least one politically critical tweet at some point in the sample (against 48 percent of lovers), and haters criticize on 5.98 percent of their author-days against lovers' 1.81 percent and unlabeled users' 1.11 percent. Haters are also noticably less positive in their disposition – their baseline mean affect is 0.024, compared to 0.191 for lovers and 0.239 for unlabeled users. In short, opponents of entertainment in Saudi are more politically vocal and the least cheerful group in the corpus, and the group with the most room to move on both margins.

The substantive content of hater complaints is heterogeneous. The majority of haters make complaints related to religious and traditional values. Some users object to the introduction of entertainment on religious grounds and express skepticism toward government claims that cinema expansion will create employment opportunities for Saudis. Others contrast participation in musical concerts with religious devotion, presenting the expansion of entertainment as inconsistent with Islamic practice.

Other complaints pertain quality of events. Some users complain about the high cost of entertainment or criticize the quality and organization of particular events, such as overcrowding, inadequate venues, and poor infrastructure. Others object to what they perceive as the cultural paucity of Saudi Arabia's entertainment initiatives, arguing that the government should devote greater attention to museums, libraries, parks, literary activities, science, and the arts. Finally, some complaints were more explicitly political, questioning the government's emphasis on entertainment when citizens continued to face concerns related to housing, healthcare, and education.

In short, while the majority of haters appear to be driven by traditional and religious values, Saudis express opposition to entertainment for a host of reasons. These complaints highlight a broad range of cultural and political viewpoints that, at least in 2018, were openly shared on Twitter. To protect user anonymity, the examples described here are paraphrased rather than reproduced verbatim.

Table 10 provides a summary of hater and lover users and tweet counts. On average, lovers' tweets are more positive than haters'; lovers are also less likely to be politically critical compared to haters.

where UserType_i captures users' pre-period attitudes toward entertainment, as described above. Users with no prior entertainment-tag use are the reference group. Because user type is time invariant, its main effect is absorbed by the author fixed effects. I report the implied effect of high-event days for each user type rather than the interaction coefficients. Users with unclear attitudes are included in the estimation but omitted from the table for clarity.

Notes: Cells report coefficients from models interacting high-event-day status with users' pre-period entertainment attitudes. The omitted category is users with no prior entertainment-tag use. The coefficient on High-event day therefore gives the estimated effect for this reference group, while the interaction coefficients show how the effect differs for haters, lovers, and users with unclear entertainment attitudes. Because user type is time invariant, its main effect is absorbed by the author fixed effects. All specifications include author and date fixed effects, with standard errors two-way clustered by city and date. Entertainment share, any criticism, and non-entertainment critical share are reported in percentage points. The final column reports fixed-effects Poisson estimates of the number of non-entertainment critical tweets, with the log of total author-day tweets as an exposure offset; coefficients are reported on the log-rate scale. Authors who never post a non-entertainment critical tweet do not contribute to the Poisson estimates. * $p < 0.05$,  $p < 0.01$,  $p < 0.001$.

Table 11 reveals substantial differences across groups. On high-event days, haters' mood improves by 0.025 standard deviations ($p = .004$), while there is no detectable change among lovers or users with no prior entertainment engagement. Thus, improvements in mood are concentrated among entertainment's opponents, rather than its supporters.

Political expression exhibits a different pattern. Both lovers and haters become less likely to criticize on high-event days. The probability of posting any critical tweet falls by 0.32 percentage points among lovers and 1.02 percentage points among haters. Relative to their baseline rates of criticism, these declines are similar in size: approximately 19 percent among lovers and 17 percent among haters.

The composition and intensity of criticism, however, are quite different between the two groups. Among haters, the share of tweets devoted to non-entertainment political criticism falls by 0.65 percentage points, from a baseline of 2.46 percent. Yet the fixed-effects Poisson estimates show no corresponding decline in the rate of critical tweeting among authors who ever criticize. The reduction among haters therefore appears to operate primarily through whether users criticize at all rather than through a reduction in the intensity of criticism among active critics.

Lovers exhibit the opposite intensive-margin pattern. Their share of non-entertainment criticism does not appear to change in the full author-day panel, but among authors who ever criticize, high-event days reduce the rate of non-entertainment critical tweeting by 0.140 log points ($p < .001$), equivalent to a decline of approximately 13 percent. Entertainment therefore reduces both the probability that lovers criticize and, among politically critical lovers, the rate at which they do so.

These patterns are largely robust to alternative specifications (Appendix Tables 25 - 29). The decline in haters' criticism holds with city-by-month fixed effects, excluding Riyadh, excluding high-volume authors, and restricting haters to those with religious or traditional objections. Lovers' decline in criticism holds in all but a high-volume author exclusion. When the panel is restricted to author-days after the April 2018 classification cutoff, which removes any overlap between classification and outcome tweets, the lover effect remains significant (-0.26, $p < 0.001$). Haters' decline in criticism remains similar relative to baseline but is no longer statistically distinguishable from zero, as is their improvement in mood.

8 State entertainment as information (rather than public good)

The results above suggest that entertainment exposure reduces political criticism among both supporters and opponents of entertainment. They do not, however, identify what aspect of entertainment produces this response. Saudi GEA events, in effect, bundle two government actions together: the entertainment event itself and government messaging about the event. That is to say, citizens experiencing a BTS concert are treated with both the BTS concert and information about the government organizing a BTS concert. If the effect of entertainment on political criticism ran through information about government-sponsored entertainment events as opposed to the events themselves, we should be able to observe changes in criticism with respect to government messaging alone. I test this using the daily tweet volume of @Enjoy_SA, the GEA's promotional Twitter account as an alternative (nationally-varying) treatment. Note that because this treatment does not vary across cities within a day, date-fixed effects absorb its main effect and only group-specific interactions are identified.

Table 12 reports these results, and they are close to uniformly null – there is almost no relationship between the number of government messages about entertainment events and user online mood or probability of criticizing the government. The only marginally significant cell is a small increase in lovers' critical share (0.040 percentage points per SD). Read alongside the results above – where a substantial fraction of lovers' criticism consists of entertainment – this may be a result of increases to entertainment criticism.

These null results suggest that entertainment events impact political expression, while publicity about entertainment does not. That is to say, an entertainment good must be provided, not merely advertised, to have an effect on online expressed criticism, suggesting that entertainment does not function through purely informational or propaganda channels.

Month FE	Yes

The dependent variable in all models is the daily count of non-reply tweets from @Enjoy_SA on day t. Each coefficient and standard error pair reports a separate OLS regression. Negative tweet share and political criticism share are measured in percentage points. Coefficients therefore report the change in the number of @Enjoy_SA tweets on day t associated with a one-percentage-point increase in the relevant lagged share. For example, the coefficient of -0.849 indicates that a one-percentage-point increase in the share of politically critical tweets on the previous day is associated with 0.849 fewer @Enjoy_SA tweets on day t. The 3-day and 7-day measures are averages of the daily shares over the preceding three and seven calendar days, respectively. All models include day-of-week and month fixed effects. Heteroskedasticity-robust standard errors are in parentheses. * $p < 0.1$,  $p < 0.05$,  $p < 0.01$.

Another alternative explanation is that the Saudi state uses entertainment messaging in reaction to population-level negative sentiment or political criticism. If people are upset about the implementation of a value-added tax, for example, the state might respond by advertising entertainment in attempt to distract or pacify the public. Table 13 regresses daily @Enjoy_SA volume on lagged negative sentiment and lagged political criticism, with day-of-week and month fixed effects. These coefficients show that messaging volume in fact falls after political criticism spikes, consistently across one-day, three-day, and seven-day lags (-0.849, -1.194, -1.176 percentage points), and after negative sentiment spikes as well. This is inconsistent with the idea of entertainment messaging being used as damage control – deployed at moments of heightened dissent – and consistent with it functioning as regular infrastructure aimed at an already-receptive audience. This also rules out the most obvious reverse-causality threat to the messaging design – the state is not increasing entertainment promotion in response to political criticism or negative mood.

9 Discussion

The analysis above yields four main findings. First, entertainment events reach ordinary citizens. Entertainment-related discussion among users with no revealed prior preference increases substantially on high-event days, indicating that GEA events generate a detectable response even among users who had not previously expressed an interest in entertainment.

Second, changes in affect cannot fully account for the decline in political criticism among either supporters or opponents of entertainment. Lovers become less likely to criticize despite exhibiting no detectable improvement in mood. Haters do become happier on high-event days, but the magnitude of this affective response is too small to fully explain their political response. Table 6 estimates that a one standard deviation increase in author-day mood is associated with a 1 percentage point decline in the probability of criticizing. Combining this estimate with haters' observed 0.025 standard deviation increase in mood implies a decline in criticism of only 0.025 percentage points – approximately 2.5 percent of the observed 1.02 percentage point decline. The affective channel therefore only partially explains the observed decline in criticism.

Third, reductions in political criticism are concentrated among citizens with a revealed prior stake in entertainment policy. Lovers reduce their probability of criticizing by approximately 19 percent relative to baseline, while haters reduce it by approximately 17 percent. Users with no revealed prior entertainment preference do not become less critical; if anything, their criticism increases slightly. Prior engagement with entertainment policy therefore strongly conditions its political effects. This pattern is consistent with H3, the evaluative mechanism among supporters, but the decline among opponents indicates that favorable evaluation alone cannot explain the full response.

Fourth, the reduction in political criticism is associated with exposure to entertainment events rather than government messaging about those events. Table 12 finds almost no significant relationship between the number of tweets from @Enjoy_SA, one of the government's main Twitter accounts advertising entertainment, and expressed political criticism. Similarly, I find little evidence for reverse causality – that is, the government is not tweeting about entertainment in response to negative mood or political criticism online.

Given that these effects are concentrated among a relatively small subset of users, how politically consequential can entertainment provision really be? Two considerations suggest that even modest effects may matter.

Firstly, entertainment and leisure goods may provide a cheaper complement to traditional rentier-state subsidies (Beblawi 1987; Luciani 1988; Hertog 2009). In 2019, the Saudi government reportedly spent 30 billion SAR (8 billion USD) investing in large-scale entertainment projects ('Saudi King launches $23 billion entertainment projects' 2019) – including King Salman Park, Sports Boulevard, Green Riyadh, and Riyadh Art – compared to an estimated 148 billion SAR on the public sector wage bill (39.5 billion USD) (Radwan and Malik 2021). Unlike recurring wages and private transfers, a large portion of spending on entertainment and leisure infrastructure takes the form of capital investment (though these projects also incur ongoing operating and programming costs). Entertainment and leisure can also be co-financed or fully financed with private capital, further reducing the cost to the state (Global Chain AMC First to Enter Cinema Sector in Saudi Arabia 2018). To the extent that these goods generate durable political benefits, entertainment and leisure may offer more bang for an autocrat's buck, relative to private material redistribution (Kinninmont 2018; Freer 2017).

Secondly, reducing online political criticism may also reduce its reach, given the structure of social media. Table 14 shows that politically critical tweets are substantially more likely to be retweeted than non-critical tweets. Controlling for author and date fixed effects, critical tweets are 14.6 percentage points more likely to receive at least one retweet. This relationship persists in the more restrictive comparison of tweets posted by the same author on the same day – critical tweets are 12.0 percentage points more likely to be retweeted, and 5.6 percentage points more likely after accounting for tweet length, mentions, media, and hashtags. While these patterns are descriptive rather than causal, they point to the idea that curtailing the direct production of political criticism may also reduce the overall circulation of critical content online. Thus, from the perspective of an autocrat, even a marginal reduction in online politically critical content may make the provision of leisure and entertainment worthwhile.

Notes: Columns (1)–(4) report linear probability models in which the dependent variable equals one if a tweet received at least one retweet. Coefficients are interpreted as changes in probability. Columns (5)–(6) report incidence-rate ratios from Poisson regressions of retweet counts. Values greater than one indicate higher expected retweet counts. Tweet characteristics include tweet length and indicators for mentions, media, and hashtags. Standard errors are clustered by author and reported in parentheses for the linear probability models. 95% confidence intervals are reported in brackets for the incidence-rate ratios. Poisson models exclude author fixed-effect groups for which the outcome is always zero. Critical tweets constitute 0.61% of tweets in the sample; 35.7% of critical tweets receive at least one retweet, compared with 20.0% of non-critical tweets.  $p < 0.001$,  $p < 0.01$, * $p < 0.05$.

10 Conclusion

Authoritarian durability has been explained through repression, material cooptation, and the manipulation of information. However none of these frameworks fully account for the authoritarian strategy of investing in citizen wellbeing and quality of life – particularly through the provision of leisure and entertainment, that is to say, circuses.

Political science has largely left this strategy undertheorized. Research on wellbeing and political behavior is drawn almost entirely from democracies (Flavin and Keane 2012; Ward 2020; Lindholm 2020), while work on authoritarian states approaches the role of entertainment and leisure from the perspective consumerist quiescence (Wedeen 2019), propaganda and nationalism (Chen and MacDonald 2020), cultural censorship (Esberg 2020), or foreign media (Kern and Hainmueller 2009). None directly tests whether the provision of entertainment itself demobilizes expressed criticism of the state. This paper takes seriously a claim increasingly made by authoritarian governments themselves: providing entertainment and leisure improves citizens' wellbeing. It asks whether doing so also reduces political complaints, and through what mechanism.

The evidence presented in this paper offers a qualified yes. Across more than 22 million Saudi tweets, happier users are consistently less politically critical. Yet exploiting variation in the timing and location of actual entertainment events shows that this relationship cannot explain most of entertainment's political effects. On average, entertainment does not make people happier. Among opponents of entertainment, for whom events do produce a measurable improvement in mood, the magnitude of that improvement predicts only approximately 2.5 percent of the observed decline in criticism. Supporters, meanwhile, become substantially less critical but not any happier. Entertainment can therefore demobilize political expression, but it does not appear to do so primarily by making citizens happier.

The results also do not support a simple attention-substitution account. Entertainment events generate substantial increases in entertainment-related discussion, demonstrating that citizens notice and respond to their provision. Yet this additional attention does not crowd out political expression – among ordinary users with no revealed prior preference towards entertainment, political criticism does not decline and, if anything, increases slightly.

Instead, entertainment's political effects are concentrated among citizens who had already revealed a stake in entertainment policy. Both prior supporters and opponents become less likely to express political criticism on high-event days, while citizens with no revealed prior engagement do not. The margins of adjustment differ, however. Among supporters, entertainment reduces both the probability of criticizing and, among those who criticize, the rate of non-entertainment political criticism. Among opponents, the probability of criticizing falls, but the rate of criticism among those who continue to criticize does not. Prior attitudes toward entertainment thus appear to shape how users respond to its provision by the state.

These findings suggest a broader way of thinking about why state-provided entertainment may be politically valuable under authoritarianism. Existing theories of cooptation focus largely on material benefits, such as jobs, subsidies, and patronage, that create dependence on the regime. Entertainment may work differently. Rather than creating material dependence, it can shape political behavior through the experience of entertainment itself. Authoritarian governments may therefore benefit politically from making everyday life more enjoyable, even when those benefits are not explicitly political.

These findings do have limitations. Users whose prior attitudes toward entertainment can be identified are a small and unusually engaged subset of Saudi Twitter users, and they are not necessarily representative of the broader population. More importantly, while the results provide little support for improved affect or attention substitution, they cannot tell us exactly why entertainment changes political expression among users already engaged with the policy. These responses could reflect changes in evaluations of the government, satisfaction with entertainment policy itself, political gratitude, or some other mechanism. Finally, the effects may depend on the Saudi context, where the expansion of entertainment was both new and politically salient. Whether similar effects occur in other settings remains an important question for future research.

Altogether, these findings show that leisure and entertainment deserve attention as instruments of authoritarian governance. Entertainment can reduce political criticism even when it does not make the average citizen happier or distract them from politics. Its consequences, instead, depend on citizens' prior relationship to the good being provided. The intuition behind Juvenal's "bread and circuses" remains relevant for modern day states, but for reasons more complicated than distraction or pleasure.

Notes: Date fixed effects already absorb the level of any national day-specific shock, so Ramadan and Eid indicators are not separately identified; only their interactions with treatment are. Rows report the effect of a high-event day within each period and the differential relative to ordinary days. OLS estimates of Equation (1). All specifications include author and date fixed effects. Standard errors, reported in parentheses, are two-way clustered by city and date. High event day is an indicator equal to one when the number of concurrent entertainment events in the author's city is at or above the 75th percentile of the city-day distribution (three or more events). Mood (z) is standardized to have mean zero and standard deviation one; Mood (mean) retains its native [-1, 1] scale. Any criticism is an indicator for whether the author posted at least one politically critical tweet that day, and Share critical is the share of the author's tweets that day classified as politically critical. Coefficients and outcome means for Any criticism and Share critical are reported in percentage points (outcomes multiplied by 100). $^{*}p < 0.05$, $^{}p < 0.01$, $^{}p < 0.001$.

Notes: OLS estimates of Equation (1). All specifications include author and date fixed effects. Standard errors, reported in parentheses, are two-way clustered by city and date. High event day is an indicator equal to one when the number of concurrent entertainment events in the author's city is at or above the 75th percentile of the city-day distribution (three or more events). Mood (z) is standardized to have mean zero and standard deviation one; Mood (mean) retains its native [-1, 1] scale. Any criticism is an indicator for whether the author posted at least one politically critical tweet that day, and Share critical is the share of the author's tweets that day classified as politically critical. Coefficients and outcome means for Any criticism and Share critical are reported in percentage points (outcomes multiplied by 100). Sample: Adds city x month fixed effects. $^{*}p < 0.05$, $^{}p < 0.01$, $^{}p < 0.001$.

Column 1 reports OLS estimates for the log number of tweets posted by an author that day. Column 2 reports the share of an author's tweets classified as entertainment-related, and Column 3 reports the share classified as politically critical but not entertainment-related; coefficients and outcome means in these columns are reported in percentage points (outcomes multiplied by 100). Column 4 reports fixed-effects Poisson estimates of the number of non-entertainment critical tweets, with the log of total author-day tweets included as an exposure offset. The coefficient in Column 4 is reported on the log-rate scale; exponentiating it gives the proportional change in the rate of non-entertainment critical tweeting. Authors who never post a non-entertainment critical tweet do not contribute to the fixed-effects Poisson estimate. Notes: Cells report group-specific marginal effects of a high-event day calculated from models interacting high-event-day status with users' pre-period entertainment attitudes. Standard errors are calculated for the corresponding linear combinations of coefficients. The reference group consists of users who did not use an entertainment-related hashtag prior to the classification cutoff. Entertainment lovers and haters are classified using entertainment-related tweets posted prior to the cutoff. Users who used entertainment-related hashtags but whose attitudes could not be clearly classified are included in estimation but omitted from the table for clarity. All specifications include author and date fixed effects, with standard errors two-way clustered by city and date. A high event day is a city-day at or above the 75th percentile of the city-day distribution of concurrent entertainment events (three or more events). Entertainment share, any criticism, and non-entertainment critical share are reported in percentage points. The final column reports fixed-effects Poisson estimates of the number of non-entertainment critical tweets, with the log of total author-day tweets as an exposure offset. Coefficients are reported on the log-rate scale. Authors who never post a non-entertainment critical tweet do not contribute to the Poisson estimates. The contrast row reports the hater-minus-lover difference, which is the interaction coefficient a lover-referenced specification would report. Baseline outcome means are computed on non-high-event days within each group. Sample: Adds city x month fixed effects. $^{*}p < 0.05$, $^{}p < 0.01$, $^{}p < 0.001$.

Entertainment lovers and haters are classified using entertainment-related tweets posted prior to the cutoff. Users who used entertainment-related hashtags but whose attitudes could not be clearly classified are included in estimation but omitted from the table for clarity. All specifications include author and date fixed effects, with standard errors two-way clustered by city and date. A high event day is a city-day at or above the 75th percentile of the city-day distribution of concurrent entertainment events (three or more events). Entertainment share, any criticism, and non-entertainment critical share are reported in percentage points. The final column reports fixed-effects Poisson estimates of the number of non-entertainment critical tweets, with the log of total author-day tweets as an exposure offset. Coefficients are reported on the log-rate scale. Authors who never post a non-entertainment critical tweet do not contribute to the Poisson estimates. The contrast row reports the hater-minus-lover difference, which is the interaction coefficient a lover-referenced specification would report. Baseline outcome means are computed on non-high-event days within each group. Sample: Traditional haters only. $^{*}p < 0.05$, $^{}p < 0.01$, $^{}p < 0.001$.

D City distribution

Riyadh dominates the dataset with 6.1 million tweets, followed by Jeddah (3.3 million), Makkah (1.1 million), and Dammam (0.9 million). Together, the ten largest cities account for roughly 70 percent of all tweets with identifiable city tags. The author–day panel reflects similar concentration: Riyadh alone contributes 2.3 million author-day observations, followed by Jeddah with 1.25 million.

E Robustness of criticism measure

As the happiness and criticism measures are both derived from tweets, I compare monthly aggregate criticism share against Google Trends search volume for two politically critical-adjacent Arabic terms — "corruption" (fasad) and "arrest" (i'tiqal) — over the same national window (November 2017–July 2019, n=21). Both series move in the expected direction: monthly search interest in "corruption" is positively associated with monthly criticism share (b=0.0007, p=.04), and search interest in "arrest" shows the same sign (b=0.0004, p=.07). Because Google search behavior is not authored content and does not share any measurement basis with my Twitter-derived variables, this pattern is not susceptible to any shared-measurement-error concern raised for the within-Twitter comparison, and offers independent (if modest, given the short monthly series) support that the criticism measure tracks a real underlying signal of political concern rather than an artifact of tweet-based measurement.

F Temporal patterns

Figure 1 plots average daily sentiment. The happiest days in the dataset coincide with holidays and celebratory national events – including Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha, and the start of Ramadan. Figure 2 shows daily political criticism, which is far more volatile and displays a downward trend over time. The two spikes in criticism are concentrated in early 2018 and mid-2019 – possibly related to the implementation of VAT and the policy to allow women to drive.

Overall, these descriptive statistics highlight emotional positivity and very low rates of overt political criticism. Variation in both affect and criticism is driven by a small number of active authors, concentrated cities, and politically salient days.

H Emotional sentiment labeling guide

To protect the anonymity of authors, I provide a summary of the emotional sentiment classification guidelines rather than reproducing the full coding manual, which contains original tweet text. This guide was developed in collaboration with Saudi research assistants.

Tweets were classified according to the emotional state expressed by the author, rather than the moral, political, or social content of the tweet. Coders used the tweet's language, tone, emojis, rhetorical cues, and context to infer the author's dominant emotional state. When multiple emotions were present, the dominant emotion determined the classification.

Tweets were assigned to one of three categories:

- Positive: The author expresses positive affect, including happiness, amusement, affection, hope, pride, relief, gratitude, or spiritual uplift.
- Negative: The author expresses negative affect, including anger, frustration, sadness, fear, anxiety, pain, disgust, bitterness, or longing.
- Neutral: The tweet does not convey a clear emotional state. This includes factual or informational statements, reminders, promotional content, generic praise, and emotionally flat or procedural language.

H.1 Coding Rules

Sarcasm and humor. Sarcasm was classified according to the emotion it conveyed. Playful or affectionate teasing was coded as positive, while sarcasm expressing hostility, bitterness, frustration, or disapproval was coded as negative. Dry or ambiguous sarcasm without a clear emotional signal was coded as neutral.

Religious language. Religious expressions were classified according to their emotional tone rather than their religious content. Expressions conveying gratitude, joy, comfort, or spiritual uplift were coded as positive. Expressions conveying fear, grief, helplessness, or distress were coded as negative. Generic prayers or religious statements without a clear emotional signal were coded as neutral.

Organizational accounts. Standard institutional announcements, congratulations, expressions of thanks, and other formulaic organizational language were coded as neutral unless they clearly conveyed an emotional state attributable to the author.

Poetry and quotations. Coders treated the emotions expressed in poetry or quoted language as reflecting the author's emotional state and classified them according to the dominant emotional tone.

Emojis and expressive language. Emojis, repeated letters, elongation, exclamations, and other expressive cues were interpreted in context. They were not assigned a fixed sentiment: for example, crying or laughing emojis could indicate either distress or intense amusement depending on the surrounding text.

Implicit emotion. Coders considered the overall meaning of the tweet rather than relying solely on individual words or emojis. Humor, religious language, gratitude, or positive emojis could accompany an underlying negative emotional state, such as frustration or bitterness. Classification therefore reflected the dominant emotion conveyed by the tweet as a whole.

I Political sentiment labeling guide

Tweets were classified using an author-centered binary coding scheme, capturing whether the author expressed criticism of the Saudi state, its leadership, policies, institutions, or performance. To protect the anonymity of users given the political sensitivity of tweet content, I provide a summary of the classification guidelines rather than reproducing the full coding manual in this appendix. This classification guide was developed in collaboration with Saudi research assistants.

Critical. A tweet was classified as critical when the author expressed criticism, grievance, dissatisfaction, disapproval, or a desire for policy change directed explicitly or implicitly toward the Saudi state. This included criticism of:

- Laws and policies
- Government performance or institutional failure
- Public services and state-provided goods
- Economic conditions attributed to state action
- Corruption or procedural injustice
- State-sponsored social, cultural, or entertainment reforms

Non-critical. All other tweets were classified as non-critical. This included tweets without political content, expressions of support for the government, ambiguous political sentiment, factual statements, and requests for government action that did not express blame, dissatisfaction, or perceived institutional failure.

I.1 Attribution and Tone.

Classification depended on both the target and evaluative content of the tweet. A polite request for a public service was not considered criticism simply because it addressed a government agency. By contrast, allegations of unfairness, non-responsiveness, incompetence, corruption, or other government failure were classified as critical, even when expressed respectfully or deferentially.

Criticism could also be indirect. Negative evaluations of goods or policies closely associated with the Saudi state, including government-sponsored entertainment, electricity and fuel prices, and other state-provided or regulated goods, were treated as political criticism when they implied dissatisfaction with state policy or performance. Criticism of private behavior, companies, cultural phenomena, or other non-state actors was not considered political unless responsibility was explicitly or implicitly attributed to the state.

I.2 Political and Grievance Hashtags.

Hashtags were treated as part of the substantive content of a tweet. Tweets that endorsed or amplified hashtags expressing political grievances, allegations of state failure, or demands for policy change could therefore be classified as critical even when the accompanying text was indirect, poetic, or religious.

However, the presence of a grievance hashtag alone was not sufficient when the accompanying content contradicted or neutralized the grievance, defended or praised the government, was plainly unrelated to the hashtag, or appeared to use trending hashtags for advertising, spam, or visibility.

As a general rule, a grievance hashtag plus alignment or contextually meaningful ambiguous content led to critical classification. A grievance hashtag plus a pro-government, contradictory, or unrelated content led to a non-critical classification

I.3 Religious and Coded Language.

General prayers, Qur'anic language, or devotional expressions were classified as non-critical unless their context communicated grievance, helplessness, injustice, or dissatisfaction linked to government action or state policy.

Because direct political criticism may be costly in authoritarian settings, indirect, metaphorical, religious, sarcastic, and otherwise coded expressions were classified as critical when there was a clear contextual link between the negative evaluation and state responsibility.

I.4 Politically Salient Domains.

Criticism of state-sponsored entertainment and social reforms was classified as political when it challenged policies closely associated with the government's reform agenda. Criticism of state-controlled economic policies and public services was likewise considered political when it expressed dissatisfaction with government provision or performance.

Criticism of privately provided goods, private firms, social practices, sports performance, or cultural products was generally classified as non-critical unless the tweet attributed responsibility to a government institution, senior regime official, or state policy.

For public-service complaints, routine requests and functional complaints without political attribution were classified as non-critical. Complaints alleging injustice, corruption, systemic failure, or government culpability were classified as critical.

I.5 Ambiguous Cases.

The coding scheme was deliberately conservative. When the author's negative attitude or the link to government responsibility was unclear, the tweet was classified as non-critical. Ambiguous cases were flagged for adjudication.

J Hashtags flagged as potentially political

Table 38: Performance of Fine-Tuned SaudiBERT Classifiers

Model / Class	Accuracy	Precision	Recall	F1	Support	Loss
Panel A: Emotional Sentiment Classifier (3-class)
Negative	–	0.888	0.841	0.864	113	Eval: 0.484 / Train: 0.350
Neutral	–	0.800	0.819	0.810	83
Positive	–	0.880	0.900	0.890	180
Macro avg.	0.860	0.856	0.853	0.854	376
Confusion matrix:	[[95, 6, 12], [5, 68, 10], [7, 11, 162]]
Panel B: Political Sentiment Classifier (binary)
Overall	0.886	0.838	0.726	0.778	491	Eval: 0.538 / Train: 0.350
Confusion matrix:	[[337, 19], [37, 98]]
Threshold tuning:	At $p = 0.90$: Precision=0.911, Recall=0.682, F1=0.780

Notes: Metrics computed on held-out test sets after fine-tuning SaudiBERT (qarah_saudibert_2024). Panel A reports three-class emotional sentiment classification (author affect). Panel B reports binary political sentiment classification (critical vs. non-critical). Confusion matrices are in the form [TN, FP; FN, TP]. Threshold tuning prioritizes precision over recall, with $p_{\text{crit}} \geq 0.90$ used in the main analyses.

M Concerns about bots

A substantial literature has pointed to the prevalence of online bots, that is, automated software that post, like, retweet, or interact with other users, often without human intervention, on Saudi Arabia Twitter. In the hands of political actors, bots can be used to shape public opinion by spamming hashtags and retweeting particular messages, distorting public discourse and drowning out legitimate debate (Maréchal 2016; M. O. Jones 2019). As (M. O. Jones 2019) write, "When hashtags are made prominent by bots, they shift from being genuine ad hoc publics to ad hoc public relations, reflecting the particular agenda of the propagandist paying for and/or organizing the campaign." In 2017, an estimated 9 to 15% of Twitter accounts were bots (Varol et al. 2017). On Saudi Twitter, M. O. Jones (2017), for example, finds that bots were responsible for amplifying a positive tweet by President Donald Trump about King Salman in 2017, and for up to 71% of accounts tweeting particular hashtags related to the Gulf crisis with Qatar in 2017 (M. O. Jones 2019). Twitter suspended thousands of Twitter accounts suspected of being bots during the Gulf crisis ("Twitter suspends thousands of fake accounts from UAE" 2019). Given my dependent variable of political hashtag usage in Saudi, this raises concerns that I am in fact not capturing genuine usage of political hashtags by Twitter users, but rather the behavior of bots spamming particular hashtags and tweets as a part of a propaganda campaign the Saudi government.

Given limitations to researcher access to X data post-Elon Musk's takeover of the platform, I am not able to access user-level data of users in my dataset – such as account creation date, bio and historical tweets – and thus face some constraints in available bot detection techniques. I cannot, for example, use the anomaly method developed by Marc Owen Jones in which bots are identified by groupings. This technique identifies bot accounts by detecting statistically improbable patterns of coordinated behavior across multiple accounts, such as unusually similar creation dates for accounts tweeting on the same political hashtag (M. O. Jones 2019; Abrahams and Leber 2020).

That said, several factors suggest bots might be not be a concern in this dataset. Firstly, I have removed tweets from users who ever tweet more than 25 times in a day from the analysis. This is far above the threshold suggested by organizations monitoring bots – the Atlantic Council's Digital Forensics Labs benchmark for suspicious accounts is 72 tweets in one day, for example (DFRLab 2017). In addition, some research suggests that the fear of bots shaping Twitter discourse in the Middle East is overblown – an examination of 149 popular pandemic-related search terms and hashtags used in the Middle East on Twitter during Covid-19 finds only 3 to 7% of users using these hashtags are bots Abrahams and Aljizawi 2020. Similarly, in an examination of 279 hashtags used across the Middle East, Abrahams and Leber (2020) find that only 5 to 9% of accounts using these hashtags are bots, using two different bot identification techniques. In an accompanying in-depth process-tracing exercise of Saudi hashtags, the authors find weak evidence of bot prevalence and weak evidence that bots are pro-regime (Abrahams and Leber 2020). Finally, limiting my analysis to tweets that are geotagged likely limits the number of bot accounts – bots are designed to maintain anonymity, which is undermined by the use of geotags, and geotagging is usually unnecessary for the their objectives to amplify trends and spam hashtags.

N Threshold Tuning for Precision

To select the decision threshold for the political classifier, I computed precision, recall, and F1-scores on the held-out test set across thresholds ranging from 0.50 to 0.95. The priority in the political classifier was to minimize false positives to avoid inflating criticism counts in the dataset. I chose a threshold of 0.90, which maximizes precision while retaining acceptable recall.

Table 39: Threshold Tuning for Political Classifier Precision–Recall Tradeoff

Threshold	Precision	Recall	F1
0.50	0.8376	0.7259	0.7778
0.55	0.8522	0.7259	0.7840
0.60	0.8509	0.7185	0.7791
0.65	0.8584	0.7185	0.7823
0.70	0.8661	0.7185	0.7854
0.75	0.8739	0.7185	0.7886
0.80	0.8889	0.7111	0.7901
0.85	0.8962	0.7037	0.7884
0.90	0.9109	0.6815	0.7797
0.95	0.9167	0.6519	0.7619

Notes: Precision, recall, and F1 scores computed on the held-out test set at varying probability thresholds. Tweets were classified as "critical" when $p_{\text{crit}} \geq$ threshold, using predicted probabilities from `Trainer.predict()`. A threshold of 0.90 was selected to maximize precision while minimizing false positives, consistent with the objective of identifying genuine criticism.
